Reports reached Washington yesterday that one of Fidel Castro's demands for freeing invasion prisoners is a pledge that the United States will not attack Cuba.

U. S. officials said they could not confirm the reports, which have been circulating in Miami. But these officials said flatly that the Kennedy Administration would give no such guarantee if, indeed, that was to be part of Castro's terms.

In New York, attorney James Donovan said the ransom money to buy food, medicine and other supplies "will come from private gifts, not from the Government." Appearing on a television interview, Donovan also said he expects Cuban-American relations to improve sharply once the prisoners are freed. Donovan has been negotiating with Castro for the release of the prisoners, taken in the April, 1961, Bay of Pigs invasion.
